

Probably the roughest, highest, and most spectacular shaped of all badlands in Montana are the so called Missouri River Breaks found along the Missouri River between Fort Benton and Fort Peck. In the following story the writer relates some of his experiences while surveying the area during the period 1917 to 1919.

The following article is of especial interest at this time because of the controversy over whether to allow the construction of huge dams along the Missouri River and flood, and destroy forever the great natural beauty of those colorful and fantastic shaped landscapes.
